Market for food boxes in the UK

The food box market is estimated to exceed £1.5 billion within the UK in 2022, with sales of food boxes expected to rise 55% year on year. The sudden increase in the demand for food and recipe boxes has led to rapid growth within the market and has led to a significant rise in the number of local, national and international food box brands.

Approximately 26% of households are now purchasing food boxes weekly. The market is dominated by leading brands HelloFresh, Gousto and Mindful Chef, with an increase in the number of niche food box providers supplying specialised boxes such as Japanese, organic and vegan meals.

Market leader HelloFresh has recently reported an increase in demand and now provides 250,000 food boxes each month. Research by Statistica has shown that over the past year alone food box subscriptions have increased by 48% and have become the leading type of subscription box around the globe. The Guild of Fine Food supports such findings by highlighting that 36% of consumers now use the internet to source ingredients, recipes or meal kits in the form of food boxes.

Mindful Chef is another food box company. Its most recent market share report has highlighted that its food boxes are most popular with those in the 18–34 age group, with 18% of those signing up to more than one food box service. In contrast, only 3% of those over the age of 55 use the service.

The concept of food boxes is not something new and some of the larger brands have been in operation since 2015. However, the past three years have led to changes in social trends, such as more people cooking at home and an increase in demand for the direct delivery of recipes and ingredients. Society has become more focused on enjoying cooking, which has resulted in a decrease of takeaway sales and an increase in the popularity of food boxes.

Research by the Financial Times shows that most people who purchase food boxes do so for the following reasons:

- The ease of having food and recipes delivered to their door.
- The enjoyment of being able to cook different recipes each week.
- The novelty and surprise of having meals delivered.
- The ability to try new foods and experiment with different ingredients.
- The access to high-quality products and restaurant-standard meals.

Some younger consumers also highlight that staying on trend is a key reason for subscribing to food boxes and will subscribe to multiple food boxes if there are offers and promotions.

More recently, supermarkets have challenged the food box market with both Marks & Spencer (M&S) and Morrisons launching meal kit boxes that consumers can cook and enjoy at home. M&S offers a selection of meals for two that include a starter, main, side and dessert, relying on its brand image, loyal customer base and guarantee of 100% British ingredients to attract buyers. Whereas Morrisons has specifically targeted the family market with food boxes that provide a family of four with five meals.

HelloFresh

The market leader in the UK is HelloFresh that offers weekly food boxes for two to four people. Boxes are priced at between £42.99 and £60.99. HelloFresh has a menu of over 37 recipes each week and offers themed and seasonal dishes throughout the year.

Calorie Smart Box	A selection of five meals that are under 600 calories per serving and have health benefits.

HelloFresh has a large social media following and regularly uses influencers to showcase its recipes. More recently, the brand has changed its marketing message to highlight the social benefits of its products. The 'Fresh from the 'gram' message has directly encouraged consumers to connect and interact through Instagram to share their stories and showcase the power of the products in bringing people together.

As part of its most successful marketing campaign, HelloFresh linked with celebrities who share their experiences of preparing, cooking, and eating different recipes over a 21-day period using the hashtag #RefreshWithHelloFresh on a range of social media platforms. The campaign was targeted at young adults and health-conscious families.

Gousto

Gousto was the first UK-based food box service. It offers a menu of up to 60 recipes, which consumers can select for themselves. Boxes are priced between £24.99 and £47.75. Gousto offers festive meals, calorie controlled and healthy meals alongside branded Lean in 15 recipes endorsed by Joe Wicks.

Family Box	Offering two, three or four recipes for two adults and up to three children each week. Recipes can be selected by the consumer.

In 2021 Gousto launched its 'Give it Some' campaign that was used to challenge the opinion that food boxes can become repetitive and boring. The campaign used a combination of music and celebrities to liken food taste and the products to music tastes with the message of 'whatever your taste, we've got something for you'. Interactions on social media reached over one million and product sales reached a point where Gousto had to stop food box subscriptions for new customers.

The brand now has a heavily digital marketing strategy that makes use of social media platforms and post-sharing to reach new potential customers. However, its main aim is to retain customers and reduce subscription cancellations through customer engagement and innovation.

Smaller providers often have higher priced products due to their bespoke nature, with some charging £16.99 for a meal for two and others charging a different price for each meal selected. Most food box businesses offer discounts for new customers and offer incentives for those who encourage others to subscribe.

However, the long-term outlook for food boxes is not as positive say Delish.com, a specialist magazine on trends in food and drink. On average less than 20% of UK customers have kept their subscription services for more than a year, with research showing that the average consumer cancels their subscriptions within five months.

Most consumers highlight that their reason for cancelling is that the food boxes become repetitive and the meal choice is not sufficient. 46% of consumers state their cancellation is due to financial reasons. It is no surprise therefore that the market leaders in food boxes state customer retention as their key focus for the coming year.

In a recent report, a global food and drink analyst suggested that the success of any food box company is based on customer retention. They stated that food boxes are notably expensive to produce and rely on the consumer 'wanting' to stay in and cook, which limits their ability to be spontaneous. Therefore, food box brands now need to think outside the box and consider what other products, add-ons and benefits they can link to their products in order to sustain and maintain custom and relationships.

Food box brands have also come under more intense scrutiny due to their excessive use of single-use plastics. Consumers are calling for market leaders to review how they package ingredients and print recipe cards to reduce the amount of waste.

As part of the growing concerns for the environment, the UK Government has started a consultation on single-use plastic packaging. The consultation will challenge food box businesses to consider their carbon footprint and their impact on the environment.

Gousto has responded by cutting back on all packaging and is using environmentally friendly materials across all food boxes, which has cut plastic use by 50%. Riverford has also responded by launching a recycling guide to show consumers what can be reused, recycled and returned. The company has also pledged to remove all plastic packaging from its fruit and vegetables.
